What Is A Critical Incident?

Emergency response personnel operate under a variety of stressors: the uncertainty of the next call, the human tragedies involved, the hazards associated with the rescue, and the fear of doing something wrong.

Most often we can cope with these stressors and consider them as “part of the job.” Some situations, however, cause lasting impressions which can challenge our ability to function on the job and at home. It is these situations which produce the unusually strong emotional reactions that are referred to as critical incidents.

It can be:

- a sudden death or serious injury of an infant or child
- a prolonged rescue effort
- a responder knowing the victim or family
- an injury or death of co-worker

“There is no training in the world, no person in the world who can stand the constant bombardment of human misery without help.”

Jeffrey T. Mitchell, PhD

How Can A Critical Incident Affect Me?

Normal symptoms following a critical incident can include preoccupation, insomnia, loss of appetite, difficulty in concentration, flashbacks, or feelings such as guilt, hopelessness, anxiety, or simply helplessness.

Although these reactions are considered normal, they can have a serious effect on the emergency responder’s physical and emotional well-being.

What Is A Critical Incident Stress Debriefing?

A Debriefing:

- is a group session led by a CISM Team of specially trained individuals
- is not a critique or a performance evaluation
- helps participants to focus on the event and share their thoughts and feelings
- is confidential
- is usually conducted within a 60-90 minute time frame

How Does A Debriefing Help?

Emergency response personnel benefit from a Debriefing because it:

- provides a supportive and caring atmosphere

- helps participants to identify the signs/symptoms of normal reactions
- reduces feelings of isolation and inadequacy
- contributes to the prevention of burn-out
- provides reassurance and support to others
- provides better coping skills for future incidents

Who Can Use This Program?

CISM services are available to first responders, ambulance crews, hospital staff, dispatchers, peace officers, fire-fighters, and other members of the emergency response system in the eleven-county area of southeastern Minnesota.
